The study of herbal medicine plays a crucial role in the curriculum of BHMS. Practical exposure to herbal gardens and laboratory sessions allows students to gain a deeper understanding of the medicinal properties of plants, their cultivation, and their use in homeopathic treatments. The objective of the sessions was to provide hands-on experience in the identification, cultivation, and use of medicinal plants, as well as the preparation of homeopathic medicines using scientific laboratory methods. The herbal garden consists of a wide variety of medicinal plants, including Tulsi, Aloe Vera, Ashwagandha, Neem, and others. Students were introduced to the cultivation techniques, soil management, and sustainable harvesting practices. Regular visits to the garden allowed students to observe the growth cycle of these plants and understand their medicinal applications in homeopathy. The laboratory sessions were designed to provide students with practical skills in preparing herbal extracts and tinctures. They were taught to analyze plant samples for active compounds and use standard laboratory equipment, including microscopes, distillation apparatus, and weighing scales. Techniques such as maceration, filtration, and potentization were demonstrated, giving students a hands-on understanding of medicine preparation. Students were tasked with maintaining plant logs in the herbal garden and preparing reports on specific plants. In the laboratory, they worked in teams to prepare samples of homeopathic remedies and tested the quality and purity of these preparations. They also presented their findings during group discussions and practical exams. These practical sessions significantly enhanced the students' understanding of the relationship between plants and their therapeutic properties. The combination of herbal garden work and laboratory experiments not only increased their knowledge but also developed their skills in medicine preparation, which is critical in their future practice as homeopaths.
